A TRAGEDY ON BROADWAY. Little Breadwinner Loses His Life In

the Terrible Grind For Existence. Right in front of the Imperial hotel, in the heart of upper Broadway, a poor little life was crushed out. From the rear platform of a cable car a small figure had alighted. There had been no slowing up

The little passenger who jumped from it to his death would never have understood that his safety was being consulted even had the car been brought to a standstill. To him cable cars were as to older folks life's business opportunities are said to be, something to be selsed in passing and quickly dropped when profitless. He was a little news merchant. His name was Isaac Levinberg. He was 9 years old, and he was ambitious. On a long, white, dusty road on a midsummer day in the country his little personality would not have been strikingly conspicu-ous. You might have driven by in a coach and four and not noticed him, though he would have carried your magnifloones in memory long after the dust cloud from your wheels had settled and you were out of sight. Poor little chap, it was on no broad country road, with only solitary coach to dodge, that his path of pleasure or duty lay.

In the glare of blinding electric lights, amid the din of clanging alarm bells, on slippery pavements ringing with the noise of horses' hoofs, he was—and there are thousands of others like him—obliged to keep one eye open for business and the oth-er for personal safety.

It was no leisurely, lumbering stage-coach on a sandy road that was bearing down on the wee passenger who had alight-ed at Broadway and Thirty-second street, but one of those great express wagons drawn by spirited horses, where the driver sits 'neath a hooded canopy high up like king on a throne, and too often with a king's indifference to the fate of ordinary mortals. This particular wagon belonged of speed.

Probably the newsboy miscalculated the distance between the bobbing heads of the cable express horses and the rear of the cable car. He thought there was room to dodge through—and goodness knows the merest crack would seem to have sufficed—but he failed. The pole of the wagon struck him, knocking the bundle of unsold merchan-dies from under his save and travels him dise from under his arm and turning him over like a tenpin. Even then his life might have been saved had there been in the mind of the driver any thought of the sacredness of human life and the importance of guarding against its destruction. But the driver's thoughts were elsewhere and—well, when tender hands lifted the boy from under the wheels, his little head was crushed, and it was seen that he was mortally hurt. The driver was taken into custody by Policeman McCormick.

This occurred just before 7 o'clock.
Broadway was not so crowded with pleasure seekers as it would have been an hour later, but there were still plenty of eyes to be made wet by the spectacle as the small bundle of expiring humanity was carried into the up town office of The World, at 1267 Broadway, and laid on a bed of newspapers that were spread out on the floor. A hurried call was rung for an ambulance, but before its arrival the boy was dead. Just as he died the door of the office opened to admit a man whose face was white with fear.

"I hear," he exclaimed as he pressed his way into the crowded room, "that a news boy has been killed. Let me look at him It's my own boy-I fear it may be. God help me." Room was made for the man, who at sight of the bloody face uttered a moan of sorrow and threw himself on his knees by the side of the body.

While he was in this attitude the swarm of newsboys who clustered about the door made room for a little chap 11 years old to step within. Under his arm the newcomer carried a bundle of papers, but these dropped as he caught sight of the dead body and the kneeling man.

"Don't cry, dad," he said as he threw his arms around the neck of the man.

It was at this juncture that the emotion of the bystanders demanded an outlet. In an instant a dozen hands came from as many pockets with silver in them, and this spontaneous collection was forced upon the living boy, whose name is Aaron
